

The Spider and the Sine Function

Nathan Dann

Scorched earth,
summer verdure bloated with self-satisfaction,
reduced to soot.

Time is not linear; it expands and contracts.
It bulges and swells;
it sets itself ablaze in its fury;
it collapses under its own weight.

A spider,
the arbiter of fate,
wakes from her slumber.

In the dark,
she toils noiselessly,
recommencing her eternal labor
of mending the fragments of a world blown asunder.

The moon fades,
but not a moment too soon.
Her work is complete:
a conglomerate of rubble and ash.

With the break of dawn
emerges a lone shoot.
It embeds its roots deeper
ever deeper,
glutting itself
on charred ruins.

Thus a new spring is born damned to waste itself
like all those that came before.